

The National Associates Program

In 2001, the Council of the National Academy of Sciences initiated the “National Associates” program to recognize extraordinary contributions to our organization through pro bono service to National Research Council and Institute of Medicine programs.

Every year over 7,000 dedicated individuals serve without compensation on study and oversight committees of the National Research Council and the Institute of Medicine and as reviewers of one or more of our reports. This service is valued, honored, and appreciated both within our organization and by the nation. Our work in advising the government and the public on matters of science, technology, and health would not be possible without the dedicated service of these experts.

The purpose of the National Associate designation is to formally recognize individuals for outstanding contributions to our work. The National Research Council Chair designates individuals for this special lifetime honor under guidelines established by the Research Council's Governing Board.
